WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

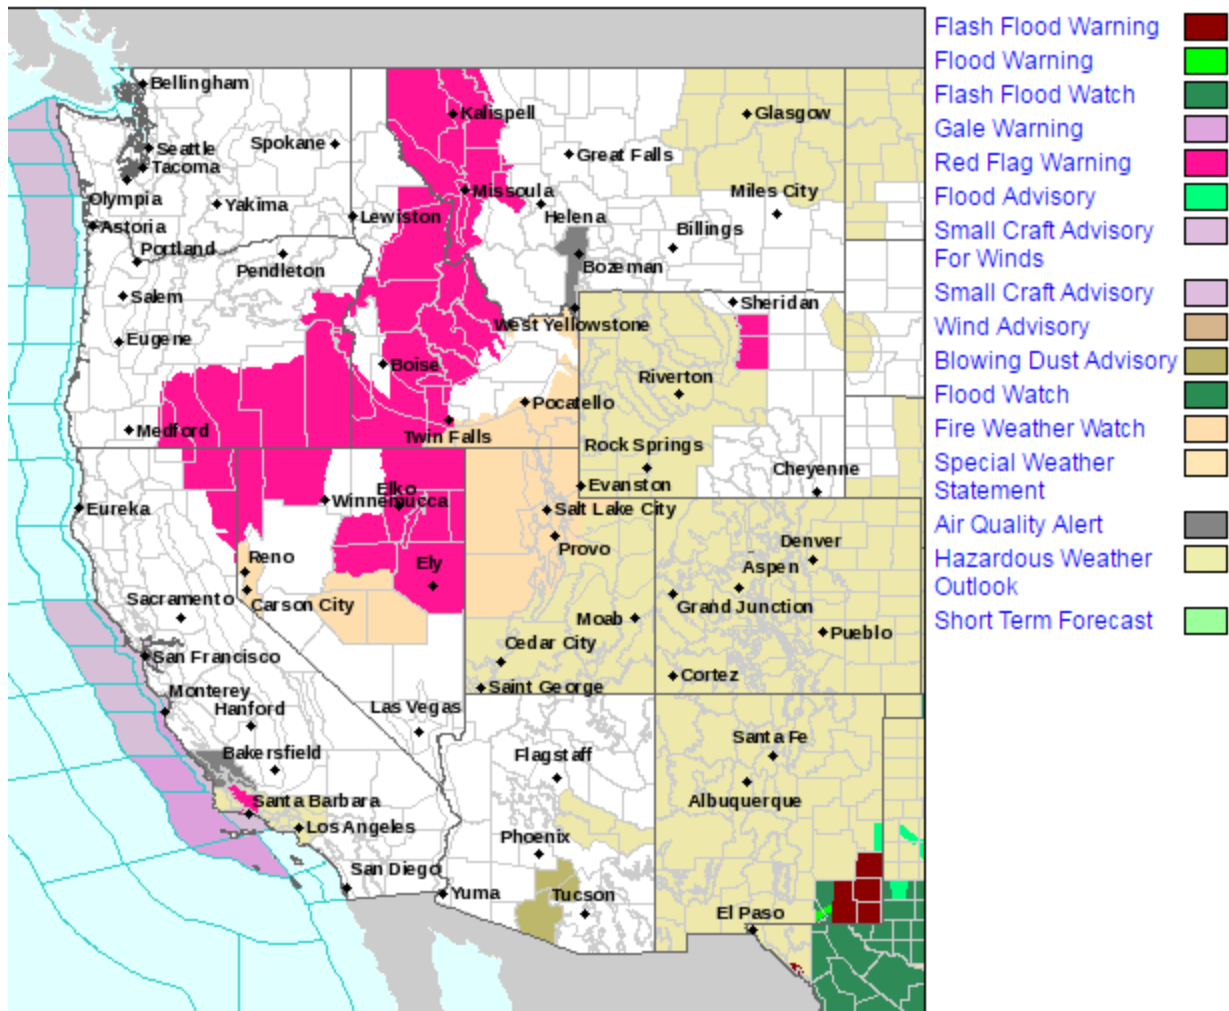

A low pressure trough will be over the region much of the week. Mild and breezy weather will prevail. A disturbance within the trough is moving through the region this morning with a few light showers, but most of the rain is evaporating before reaching the ground. Humidity will be 7-15% east of the Cascade-Sierra crest this afternoon. South to southwest winds will gust to 30-35 mph in exposed areas and east of the Cascade-Sierra crest today, and possibly reach 40 mph on the eastside. These winds just reach the low end of High Risk criteria in the eastside, and fall just below High Risk criteria elsewhere. Isolated thunderstorms are possible later today as the system moves through Siskiyou and Modoc Counties. Any showers or thunderstorms this afternoon will produce light rainfall. Temperatures throughout the week will be 2-5 degrees below normal. Humidity will be 10-17% east of the crest, but only drop to 17-27% west of the crest. Afternoon south to southwest winds will continue to gust to 30-35 mph in exposed areas and east of the Cascade-Sierra crest each day. As the trough sits overhead into Friday, occasional light showers will be possible near the Oregon state line. The marine layer will remain near 2000' deep and bring cool humid conditions to coastal drainages and basins. On Friday the trough will shift to our eastern areas, allowing increasing northwest to north winds to develop this weekend. These winds are not expected to reach High Risk criteria, but they will likely lead to lower humidity. However, with the trough still nearby, disturbances within the trough will still produce partly cloudy skies at times, and there is a slight chance of showers Saturday night. Temperatures will warm back up to normal or slightly above normal early next week as the trough moves off to the east.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

The high pressure ridge which has brought well above normal temperatures to the region is beginning to weaken and shift to the east. This will allow a cooler weather pattern to become established later this week. But today, a strengthening pressure gradient will result in gusty winds across a few areas today and tonight. North and northwest winds will increase to 15-25 mph with gusts to 30 mph possible along the Central Coast this afternoon. Similar wind speeds will also be possible in the Kern County Mountains. This evening into the overnight hours, expect north winds of 15-25 mph with gusts to 35 mph to spread into Santa Barbara County. Relative Humidity (RH) recovery will be very poor in these areas and some places in the Santa Ynez Range may see readings only in the teens overnight. Winds will slowly decrease Wednesday morning across all areas. Today will likely be the hottest day of the outlook period as temperatures remain 10-15 degrees above normal. Expect afternoon temperatures of 100-105 in the valleys and lower foothills with 80s common in the mountains. Minimum RH will drop once again to the 8-12% range over many areas away from the coast. Thursday into the weekend, a pair of unseasonably deep troughs will reach the West Coast which will result in cooler temperatures with an increase in marine layer coverage. By Saturday, night through morning low clouds will reach the lower coastal slopes with much higher RH at lower elevations. High temperatures may be a few degrees below normal with valley temperatures only in the 80s to lower 90s. Gusty west winds of 20-30 mph will be possible each afternoon in and near the deserts. Some gusts to 50 mph will be possible Friday afternoon. The relatively cool weather will last through the weekend before warmer temperatures along with an increase in subtropical moisture develop next Monday or Tuesday. No thunderstorms are expected during the period.
